Process: Employee Expense Reimbursement

Usually, when an employee needs to claim a business expense, they start by logging into our expense portal and creating a new claim. They provide the date of the expense, select the appropriate category, enter the amount and currency, and mention the business purpose. They also need to select the relevant cost center.

The employee is expected to attach the original invoice or receipt for every expense before submitting the claim. Once they submit it, the portal does some basic checks to make sure the required information has been provided and that receipts are attached.

If something is missing, the system sends the claim back to the employee. They have to correct whatever is missing and submit it again. We don't want these incomplete claims reaching the managers.

Once the claim passes those initial checks, it goes to the employee's reporting manager. The manager looks at the individual expenses, checks whether the business purpose makes sense, and verifies that the expenses are within our travel and expense policy.

Sometimes managers reject claims. In that case, the employee gets a notification explaining why it was rejected. The employee can make the necessary changes and send the claim back through the process.

For approved claims, there's an additional rule based on the total amount. Claims below ₹50,000 don't need another business approval and can move on to Finance. Anything above ₹50,000 needs to be reviewed by the Finance Controller before Finance processes it.

Finance then performs its own review. They check the receipts and make sure the expense categories, tax information, cost center, and approval records are all correct. If they find something that doesn't look right or an expense isn't properly supported, they send the claim back to the employee and ask for clarification or a correction.

Once Finance is satisfied with the claim, they record the approved expense in the accounting system. The reimbursement is then included in the next available payment cycle and transferred to the employee's registered bank account.

After the payment has been processed, the employee receives an email confirming the reimbursement. We also retain the claim and all of its supporting documents in the expense management system because Finance and internal audit may need to access them later.
